T. W. Harrison, Mayor, City Clerk.

New York city. One day Ben and his father were out in the field, hard at work in the hot sun, when the boy said: "Father, I want about garden truck." "Well?"

"You don't get a good price for it?"
"A mighty poor price, Ben." &'And you can't do better?" "No; I've tried all the commission dealers, and none of them pay better than Robbins." "So it hardly pays for you to go to New York?"

"No, it don't, for a fact." "Then why not let me go?"
"That wouldn't be a bad idea," said the farmer, thoughtfully. "You're getting old enough to drive to New ork now, and you ought to do that job just as well as I could. At the same time, if I let you go and stay at home myself, I can do a good deal more work about the farm. I'll think it over." That was all Mr. Baldwin said at the time; but that night, after supper, he suddenly announced:

"Ben, I think I'll let you cart the produce to New York. But you must be careful when driving through the streets of the city."

Ben promised, and then asked: "Don't you think, dad, that it would be possible to get more money than Robbins pays you?"

"No, I tell you; I've tried the whole lot of them." "Perhaps I could get more money." "But you can't."

"If I do, will you let me have all I get over Robbins' price?"

"Yes; provided you bring home cash each night. I've got to have ready money, for I'll have some help to pay off this summer." Ben went to bed that night and city ways of thinking, when he drove across One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street and kept on toward Yorkville. But instead of keeping on toward the markets, he turned down East Ninetysixth street. and drew up before one of the apartment houses. Going to the basement he pressed one of the row of buttons that stood near the dumb-waiter shaft. "Well?" demanded a woman, showag her head at the shaft door. "Want any vegetables?" "No." "But these are good-better'n any

"I know it, ma'am. That's why I've come around. I brought these in Yorkville, and I heard her say that it fresh from the country this morning." "The same old story," mumbled the fresh vegetables in that part of the woman, but she regarded attentively

Ben was quick to take advantage of the slight impression which he had produced. "Suppose you were going to buy some vegetables of me," he said, insinuatingly, "what would it be?" "Peas and cucumbers, most likely." "If you'll wait just a minute, ma'am, I'll send you up some and you can see what they're like." In a minute he was back again. He hauled the samples up on the dumbwaiter and the woman inspected the

"Why, they're really fresh," she exclaimed in surprise. "Yes'm: I told you they were." "The best I've seen this year."

"Will you take them?" "How much?" Ben named the price. It was the regular retail figure for peas and cu-

This sale made, Ben tried the other people. As soon as they saw how good and fresh the vegetables were, they were even anxious to buy. Out of the ten families in the house, Ben made seven sales.

Then he went into the next house. Here he was almost equally successful. By the time Ben Baldwin had canvassed Ninety-sixth, Ninety-fifth and Ninety-fourth streets, between Park and Third avenues, his big wagonload of produce was gone.

It was now a little past noon. With the air of a prosperous man who could afford such trifles, he stabled the horse and then went to the best restaurant he could find in that locality. A sumptuous meal followed. It was the best he had ever eaten. At least it seemed so to him, for, like the majority of boys, anything that he got in a restaurant was rather superior to

"Sold all out, I see, Ben." "Yes, sir." "Any trouble about it?" "No, sir." "And the money?"

"Here it is." "Ben counted it out, and Mr. Baldwin took possession of it. He knew the prices which Robbins paid, and found the account correct to a cent.

After that Ben drove the market wagon regularly three times a week. He visited the same district each time, and never failed to speedily sell out, for the customers that he had found on his first trip remained with him and even brought new customers. So it went on until the end of the summer. One day Ben woke up too ill to drive to market. There was nothing for it but for Mr. Baldwin to drive the wagon into the city.

When he arrived at the market where Robbins had an office, that gentleman came out. His first words "Well, Baldwin. Where have you been selling? Haven't seen you all the summer?" "But you've seen my boy right along. I sent him."

"If you did he never got here." "Are you sure of that?" "Positive." "Ben," said his father, when he rethe whole summer $194.72.

"I gave you Robbins' price each time, dad." "I know you did; I kept track of that right along."

"If you're not satisfied, dad-"I'll have to be, for I gave you my word, and I'll stick to it. But until today I thought all along that you were taking the stuff to Robbins. What put the scheme in your head to a long-felt want." "You're pretty sharp, Ben," said his father, thoughtfully. "When you reach 21 I'm going to take you in as partner on the farm."

"Thank you, dad, but I hope by that time, to be in business in the city." "Yes, I guess you are too smart to pass all your life on a farm," the armer assented.

Wales Winked.

A picture at the illumination of Chester in honor of the prince of Wales' recent visit to that city was very comical. His royal highness, owing to a slight puncture where one eye was painted on the canvas, was made to appear to be winking perpetually at a small pork shop over the way. The crowd enjoyed the fun, and one of them hinted that the winking was part of the design. The insinuation so hurt the worthy housekeeper that he instantly turned off the gas and left the prince in dark-
